An accident not only affects the victim. It can have devastating effects on the victim’s family, especially if the victim is the sole provider for the household. You might be entitled to monetary compensation for medical expenses, lost wages, vehicle repairs and so much more, depending on the nature of your personal injury case.

Keep the facts straight

Right after being injured, it’s a good idea to write down everything that you can remember while your recollection is still fresh. You don’t want to exaggerate any details or write anything dishonestly. Simply try to recall all of the details surrounding your accident and have them ready for your auto accident lawyer in Stuart to look over.

Was the other driver speeding? Were there witnesses present that could potentially be located? Were you in a school zone or at a stop sign? This information may be critical if you wind up filing a lawsuit. You may also want to read over the details that you write down about the accident from time to time so that you keep them fresh in your mind. That way, if you have to testify in court, you’ll know exactly what happened.

Your car accident lawyer will be able to help you with this as well. They’ll tell you which details will have the most impact and if any details aren’t relevant to your case.
